

BIGGEST TECH SUPPORT TIME-WASTERS

When it comes to IT support, time is money. When you take into account loss of employee productivity, a company of 10 employees could lose as much as $183/hour of downtime plus the cost of support.¹ When downtime occurs, every minute counts, and communication is key—especially if the issues are actually easy to fix. This infographic highlights some of the biggest communication barriers to resolving tickets.

3 ROADBLOCKS TO SUPPORT SUCCESS

In a Spiceworks Community post, IT pros shared some of their least-descriptive help desk tickets:²

1

Users can't accurately describe problems

"Someone just told me something is on the WHY drive. What the heck is a WHY drive and what does it do?" (Referring to the Y:\ drive)

"HELP!!! I am unable to send or receive any emails. Please advise!!!" (Note: ticket was received via email)

"Printer gave error that Toner is Low, but I can't find how to turn it up."

2

Inability to efficiently relay information to other technicians or level 2 support

Ramping up a new tech; bringing him/her up to speed on what you know

Putting together screenshots and writing descriptions of potential problems

Transferring logs and other analytics files to the new technician

3

Minor issues that nonetheless require a technical eye

Unplugged or mismanaged cables

Simple configuration changes

Patch or application installation
